The emergence of Pot Limit Omaha over the past few years has brought some variety to poker, keeping things from turning into a No Limit Hold'em monopoly. The $5,000 Pot Limit Omaha Six-Handed event drew a healthy field of 452 entries, proving that the game is gaining steam and becoming ever more popular among both the pros and more casual players. Compare that field to the $5,000 No Limit Hold'em Six-Handed event, which drew 541 players, and you can tell that PLO will definitely be a constant on the WSOP schedule in the future. The game has brought new faces to spotlight, including the most recent PLO champion Michael Drummond.

"It's definitely cool to have a milestone mark," said Drummond about his new bracelet.

Drummond is relatively new to the World Series of Poker, but he did not show any weakness at the tough $5,000 PLO final table. He defeated Darius Studdard heads-up to win his first bracelet and take home the top prize of $547,147. With Pot Limit Omaha gaining popularity and momentum in the poker world, this is the perfect event for Drummond to emerge and show his star power. Drummond is a professional poker player and has become a regular at some of the game's highest stakes.

The 27-year-old is originally from New Hampshire, but is now living in San Francisco playing any PLO game he can find. Drummond is mainly a cash game player, but will jump into a PLO tournament if he can find one, especially if it's six-max. Drummond said he definitely plans to play the $10,000 PLO event, which begins in just over a week.

"It's a social game," said Drummond about his love for PLO. "It's so much more about your cards, that you can just look at your cards and then have a conversation at the table. PLO is just a more fun, social, gambling game."

This is Drummond's fifth WSOP cash and first-ever final table. Last year, Drummond finished eighth in the $10K Heads-Up No Limit Hold'em event, eventually busting in his quarterfinal match to three-time bracelet winner Brock Parker. With this victory, Drummond has more than quadrupled his previous WSOP earnings.
